Microbial residue distribution in microaggregates decreases with stand age in subtropical plantations

Yanli Jing[1,2], Xuechao Zhao[2,3], Shengen Liu[4], Peng Tian[5], Zhaolin Sun[5], Longchi Chen[2] and Qingkui Wang[2,*]

[1] Ecology Security and Protection Key Laboratory of Sichuan Province, Mianyang Normal University, Mianyang, 621000, China

[2] Huitong Experimental Station of Forest Ecology, CAS Key Laboratory of Forest Ecology and Management, Institute of Applied Ecology, Shenyang, 110016, China

[3] University of Chinese Academy of Sciences, Beijing 100049, China

[4] College of Biological and Pharmaceutical Sciences, China Three Gorges University, Yichang, 443000, China.

[5] School of Forestry & Landscape Architecture, Anhui Agricultural University, Hefei 230036, China

*Corresponding author: Qingkui Wang

E–mail address: qwang@iae.ac.cn

Tel: +8624 8397 0206

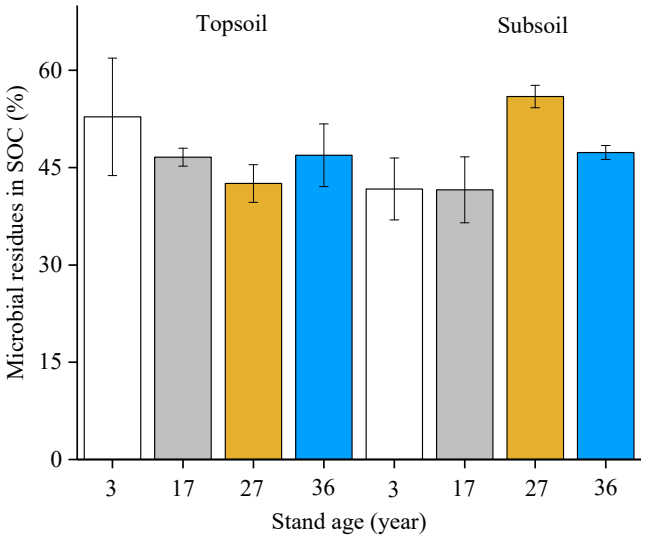

Figure S1. Microbial residues in SOC across the Chinese fir chronosequence in southern China. Values are the mean ± SE.

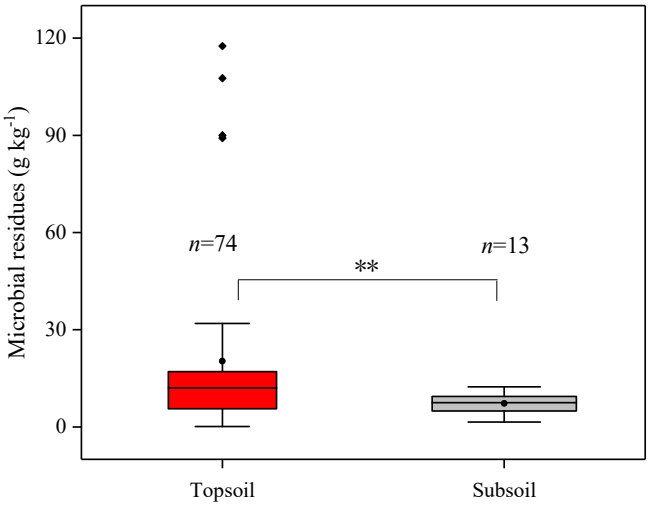

Figure S2. Microbial residues in topsoil and subsoil at a global scale. Data are from Ni et al. [1].

Reference

1. Ni, X.; Liao, S.; Tan, S.; Peng, Y.; Wang, D.; Yue, K.; Wu, F.Z.; Yang, Y. The vertical distribution and control of microbial necromass carbon in forest soils. Glob. Ecol. Biogeogr. 2020, 29, 1829–1839.